Annenberg Institute Study

Geraldine received an email from the Annenberg Institute. The Institute received a grant on Student Centered Learning. They are looking for input how families, students and communities can have a voice in school governments. There is an opportunity for a few members to participate on behalf of FEAC. Danny Smith, Lisa Valentine and Bill Cotton all indicate they were interested in learning more. Geraldine will follow-up with each of them to share next steps.

SurveyWorks – Opportunity for Input

Geraldine introduced Margaret (Peg) Votta from the RI Department of Education. Peg provided the group with an overview of RIDE's on its reinstated family survey, called SurveyWorks. In short, SurveyWorks is a set of surveys being developed to reach the following audiences: students, teachers, staff and families. The survey is designed to capture data about a schools relative strengths as compared to their own data over time, other schools in the state and even nationally. School communities can then use the data to think about what they can do to help kids improve. Peg also answered questions from the group.

FEAC was asked to give feedback on its top priorities for topic feedback. The group welcomed the opportunity. As the first group to participate in this feedback process, Peg also offered to provide the Council with its own initial survey data from the Council, and invited guests, provided individuals complete the survey by November 2nd.

After November 2nd the survey will be open to a broader audience for input, and members are welcome to distribute the link throughout RI.

Family-School Partnerships in Rhode Island

Members and their invited guests worked in small groups to begin sharing and documenting record family engagement activities that are occurring in their local schools and communities. After recording their ideas, they then grouped them in the following categories: early childhood, elementary, middle, high school, transition to adulthood and other. Members were then encouraged to walk around and take a quick break.

After the break, Stephanie provided an overview of Partners in Education: A Dual Capacity-Building Framework for Family-School Partnership. The tool was designed by Dr. Karen Mapp, a leader in the family engagement field, and Paul Kuttner for SEDL in collaboration with the U.S. Department of Education. The group focused on the set of “process conditions” research on promising practices in family engagement has shown need to be present for successful capacity-building interventions. Process conditions include: linked to learning, relational, developmental, collective/collaborative, and interactive.

After the discussion, the group then revisited their charts to indicate which conditions each activity appears to meet. The group then engaged in a second gallery walk to look for emerging themes, areas for further discussion and the like, as time for an in depth discussion was limited. Some initial thoughts included:

- people’s differing perceptions/definitions of terms/words, such as interactive;
- that the needs of families from schools may differ over time/by context (e.g. 1st child vs 4th; part time working parent vs parent with two jobs);
- resources available to schools to support these efforts (e.g. financial, time, staff availability);
- the fact that schools may need a menu of options specific to the needs of their families and every activity does not have to serve every; and
- the idea of thinking about the rationale for how you engage families in activities (Do people think about process conditions? Do they even know about them, as this is an emerging resource in the field?).

Hannah then offered to create a google document and template for the Council to use and grow this tool. She, Tonya and Dina each volunteered to take charts and record ideas shared by the group. Go team! The tool can then grow with the group over time.
